

University and online program manager partnership: a case study

Timothy C. Johnston
Murray State University

This case examines the opportunities and risks involved for a university that considered outsourcing its marketing and administration of academic programs. This university was faced with increased costs, declining enrollment, and decreased state support. Joining forces with an online program manager (OPM) to offer online graduate degrees held the promise of increased enrollment and consequently increased tuition revenues.