

Student Internship – A focus on mentorship

Phillip D. Coleman

Western Kentucky University

This case study presents itself to prepare students for a selective internship. Last year, a large government agency contacted our business college for a list of students that demonstrated competency in business analytics. The student would be required to help his or her administrator/engineer save money for the organization that was currently losing 10% a year. While no promise of a job after graduation was inferred, this could possibly lead to a business analytics department within the government agency. The analysis was conducted by the informatics department for the college along with several conversations with the hiring agency and three students were mutually chosen. The students were interviewed by the agency and one student was chosen for the internship. The case study will delve into the intricacies involved during the last 8 months of internship employment.